

About me

As an engineer I got to know how to move great things and effectively bring power to the ground. Later, as a manager myself, I learned how to free power for change and new technologies in teams. After the largest hostile takeover in German industrial history and the subsequent dissolution of the Mannesmann Group, crises, restructuring and cultural change have made our company stronger: today we are a modern concern company and world market leader. As a manager and member of the supervisory board, me and our teams are right in the middle of digital transformation and learning with new and agile forms of organizations.

As a speaker and mentor, I share my knowledge and experience. Inspiring. Entertaining. Provocative. With substance. That is my claim. That is my commitment.

My lectures are tailor-made for each individual event. Without PowerPoint? Be my guest! As an expert in leadership and strategy, I bring my own experiences of change and my own mishaps to the stage. Touch people with personal insights and perspectives. Entertain them and make them laugh. Create goose bumps moments. My goal is to inspire employees and bosses to think and shape new paths together. Listeners say that I am not a "smooth" speaker. Could be. I like to speak in plain language. After all, the point is to help your company develop successfully.

I was born in 1965, studied industrial engineering in Rosenheim, was an alumnus of the Carnegie Mellon Institute in Pittsburgh, PA, and graduated with a Master of Business Administration (MBA) from Clemson University in the USA. Meanwhile I am a multiple book author and guest author for business magazines such as Capital, Wirtschaftswoche and Focus. I am also a member of the German Speakers' Association (GSA) and the Association of German Engineers (VDI).
